It is native to much of Europe, and it has been naturalized in many countries outside its native range, including North America and southern Africa. It is a spreading perennial bunchgrass producing erect stems from rhizomes. It forms a "tufted" clump of thin, grasslike leaves. The inflorescence is an open panicle of flower spikes with shiny white flowers about a centimeter long. This plant is difficult to distinguish from closely related species in its native range. A 2014 analysis of genetic evidence based on three nuclear genes and two chloroplast genes indicated that the species was a paraphyletic group that included six species which were generally accepted as separate, but which in some cases were poorly differentiated genetically. It is usually distinguished from Z. spina-christi by its smaller leaves and less erect stems. The grass was first described by the Russian botanist Louis-Marie Sprengel in 1830, and it was formally named Zizania commutata by George Bentham in
